Description

The Stadtkirche in Jever, rebuilt after a devastating fire in 1959, is a striking blend of old and new architectural elements. Designed by architect Prof. Dieter Oesterlen, the church maintains the Greek cross layout of its predecessor while incorporating modern materials like concrete alongside traditional brickwork. The church's entrance uses the original portals, connecting the new building with its historical past, including the Edo-Wiemken-Grabmal. Inside, the church features a grey granite altar and a prominent steel cross by Berlin artist Fritz Kühn.

In 1966, Alfred Führer installed a large organ in the newly constructed church, featuring 48 registers across three manuals and a pedal. The organ, designed in collaboration with church musician Günter Maurischat, was updated in 2006 by Bartelt Immer, adding modern features like a 7000-combination electronic system while retaining its original aesthetic. This organ exemplifies the blend of tradition and innovation that characterizes the church itself.
